The Bird Feeder Count

Every winter, Grandpa Joe kept a bird feeder outside his kitchen window. When Priya came to stay for a week, he handed her a notebook and a pencil. "Let's find out which birds visit the most," he said.

The first morning, Priya sat by the window for twenty minutes. She saw two red cardinals, one blue jay and a whole crowd of small brown sparrows. She tried to count the sparrows, but they kept hopping around, so she lost track at eleven.

That night, Priya thought about the problem. The next day she made a chart with one column for each kind of bird. Instead of counting everything at once, she watched for one minute and made a tally mark for every bird that landed. Then she rested for a minute and started again.

By the end of the week, the chart was full. Sparrows had the most marks by far, and the blue jay came only on cold mornings. Grandpa Joe studied the chart and laughed. "You are a real scientist now," he said. Priya grinned and asked if they could count again in the spring.
